

It appears that America's Telephone Consumer Protection Act is such a success that the telemarketer lobbyists are trying to dismantle it. Even more alarming, the government appears to be listening. It makes me sad and angry that anyone who flashes a few million dollars to a few politicians can have their way with the people of this country. I hope the FCC does the job it was specifically designed to do instead of merely ending up as just another signature that a lobbying group has to get in order to break the law.

Warmest regards,

Alex.